Individuals with autism often experience the world as confusing and overwhelming places. Given their differently developed nervous systems and environments/environmental demands that they perceive to be chaotic and unpredictable, children and adults with autism frequently communicate their stress and anxiety through “challenging behavior”. In this follow-up workshop, participants will be guided in applying an understanding of sensory and movement differences in autism, to better interpret and address challenging behavior.

Through real examples (and even some humor), this session will explore ways to:

- Identify and manage stressors/behavioral triggers
- Understand how challenging behaviors “work” for the individual
- Develop responsive, pro-active support strategies

NOTE: Although this workshop is an extension of an earlier workshop (“Autism: Looking Thru the Lens of Sensory and Movement Differences”), those who did not attend the previous workshop are welcome to join us and will benefit from this interactive, practical learning opportunity.

You may attend as an individual or team. Teams of people will have a very good opportunity to collaborate, plan, and work together in order to make their support of a person even better.
